Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Women in the Law, Vol. 3: An Analysis of Training, Practice and Salaried Positions It was with some hesitation that I undertook to write the Foreword to this volume, for having been one of the chief, if not instigators, at least accelerators of the labors which have fructified in this form, I felt that my appreciation of its value might be too favorably prejudiced. A decade of experience in public movements, especially those organized for and by women, had convinced me that our greatest need was a body of authenticated facts from which all developments must in future be derived; in other words that it had become essential, if progress were to become orderly and not remain the mere sport of chance, to apply the empirical methods of pure science to the complex integrations of civilized society. This sentiment found sympathetic response in the Bureau of Vocational Information which had been organized to undertake just such inquiries into various fields affording new vocations to women. There remained but the easy and congenial task of convincing...
